manner. One strong drawback at present is the infrequence of communication with the Island of Hawaii and the character of the transportation. Perhaps the Wilder Steamship Company does the best it can, but it would seem as if they could afford somewhat better accommodations and more frequent service. They strongly remind one of the transportation in the backwoods days of the States, when there were few travelers and little business. If the company would get a move on itself. take pains to make known the various attractions of the places to be seen, certainly a good business might be built up and one satisfactory to the public. I shall always treasure the recollection of my trip down there as one of the delightful feature of my Island tour."
